Birds

Audubon Day

John James Audubon, born on today's date in 1785, a foremost wildlife illustrator in the United States for half a century, mainly focusing on ornithological paintings. In 1803, he moved to the family estate in Mill Grove, Pennsylvania, where he studied, drew birds, and met his wife, Lucy. He experimented with bird banding, being the first person known to have done so in North America. In 1819 he decided to float down the Mississippi River on a flatboat, with the intention of finding new birds to paint. He was successful and brought his work to England in 1826, where it was well received. He found a printer, and The Birds of America was published as a series between 1827 and 1838. It included 435 watercolor plates and was printed in a very large book format called "elephant folio." This was done so that the paintings would be life-size representations of the birds. The book set the template for other wildlife illustrations, and more recent bird artists are often measured against it.

Audubon made a trip back West in 1843 to gather info for his final work on mammals, Viviparous Quadrupeds of North America. During that last few years of his life, he began to lose his mental faculties, and he died in 1851.

After his death, George Bird Grinnell, became editor of Forest and Stream magazine and then founded the first Audubon Society, with the goal of protecting birds and their habitats. Today there are many branches of the National Audubon Society, meaning Audubon's name is forever connected to bird conservation.

Audubon Day is being observed today! It has always been observed annually on April 26th.
